Freemac reinvents itself after Apple's iMac snub

By Jim Davis

How hard can it be to give away free iMac computers? Pretty hard, if Apple won't let you.

That's the bitter pill that Jonathan Strum, president of Freemac, has had to swallow. Last year, the start-up announced that it intended to give away 1 million of the popular Apple iMac computers during the next two years.

That ambition has died because Apple decided not to let Freemac buy any iMacs to give away, not even at full retail price, Strum told CNET News.com in an interview. Apple declined to comment.

"What we're telling our customers--well over a million people who signed up--is that Apple won't let you have a free computer," said Strum. As a recourse, Freemac is reinventing itself and will be relaunched later this month as "NadaPC.com" and will give away Internet access terminals.
